Well-being Conversations for Managers - Quick refere

Practitioner course | Trainer: Grace Whitfield

The key ideas

- Why managers have well-being conversations: You see changes early

- Your role and its limits: You are not a therapist

- Opening the conversation: Choose a private, unhurried moment

- Listening without fixing: Let them finish

- Useful phrases and ones to avoid: Helpful: that sounds hard, thank you for telling me

- Knowing your limits: Do not promise confidentiality you cannot keep

- Signposting and following up: Know the support available

- Your next steps: Find your organisation’s support options

Words to know

Signposting: Pointing someone to appropriate support without taking on the role of counsellor.

Open question: A question that invites more than a yes or no answer, such as "how are things, really?"

Reflective listening: Repeating back what you heard in your own words to show you understood.

Employee assistance programme: A confidential support service some employers provide for staff.
